

WHAT IS LOVE?

Love songs have choked the charts for years, books abound on the subject and love stories have been the staple diet of filmmakers for decades. The interpretation of love reminds us all that love is very much an individual thing. It defies logic, intellect, racial boundaries and even mateship. It's impossible to describe precisely what love is because it exists on many levels, in many contexts and is wildly unpredictable. Love is dynamic and volatile. Love is conditional and can disappear at any moment. Despite the perils and pitfalls and associated mania that often comes with love, many remain undeterred in their quest to find it.

Love can't be defined by an act of parliament or a religious sacrament. It won't be bound by a social custom underpinned by a moral code of exclusivity. The concept of monogamy is a sexual perversion brought about by religion and social custom. While it's noble to attempt such an undertaking, it's absurd to believe it possible to all but a select few. Sooner or later human frailty becomes a factor and the deceit begins.

Sometimes the look of love is challenging and sometimes loves hurts. Love is a stranger and if you're all out of this crazy little thing called love you should beat it. Just Beat it. Love is what you want it to be.
